The other venues located in the park, Carioca Arenas 1 + 2, the velodrome, and the tennis center are under the operations of the Sports Ministry. Originally, the previous municipal administration tried to find a private operator for the facilities, but no company would commit to a 25-year lease. The park itself is open to the general public on the weekends, but few events have been held there.

City Hall is still working on a solution for the Deodoro Olympic Park. The park closed last December after the operator's agreement lapsed. "The latest on the situation from a spokesperson last month was, "no news about the bidding process that is in progress."

The spokesperson added to ATF that neither the Future Arena nor the shell of the Aquatics Center have been demanded. Those venues, described as abandoned by international press, "await the transfer of federal funds to tender for the demanding."

Amorim said in a statement after the event that it took City Hall a couple months to prepare the arena for public use. Its opening was important to answer "the public questioning about what was going to be done [for Olympic legacy]."

"We received this installation in March, completely empty, raw and, even without resources, in less than two months, we have been able to make use of it," Amorim said. "We are turning it into a place to practice sports and physical activity, for all the people to know and enjoy."
